science methods to target resources or prevent disease in underserved populations, and novel quantitative approaches to examine the health impacts of economic shocks, disasters, and/or policy changes. The type of quantitative methods and data expertise are also open, and may include use of computational, econometric, demographic, statistical, and/or decision science methods to analyze electronic health record, health care claims, and population-level data. We welcome applicants from a broad set of quantitative fields such as health services research, health policy, public policy, economics, political science, sociology, and related disciplines. Faculty are expected to teach courses at the doctoral, masters, and/or undergraduate levels. The UC Berkeley School of Public Health recognizes the intrinsic relationship between diversity and excellence in all our endeavors. The school embraces open and equitable access to opportunities for learning and development as our obligation and goal. We seek candidates who demonstrate a commitment to advancing diversity, equity, inclusion, and belonging through their research, teaching, and/or service. The school is committed to addressing the family needs of faculty, including dual career couples and single parents. We are also interested in candidates who have had non-traditional career paths or who have taken time off for family reasons, or who have achieved excellence in careers outside academia.
